HOW TO READ THIS MAP

Each pub on this map appears in The Westminster Code by chapter reference. The “code observed” column is what the protagonist sees on the page, photographed and verified on the ground except where noted. Where a code is the protagonist's invention, the footnote will say so. Three pubs sit at their canonical seven-pointed-crown vertices rather than at their London addresses: a faded ghost dot marks where each really stands, joined by a dashed line to the vertex. The page-2 footer (†) names the shift in metres.

FROM THE AUTHOR — C.A. STERLING

The map you are holding draws the crown Ellie Voss traces in Chapter VII. To make the seven points legible at A3 I moved three pubs onto their vertices — the dashed lines hold their true London addresses for you. The shifts are disclosed overleaf; the geometry was already there.

#	PUB	ADDRESS	CH.	CODE OBSERVED	AUTHOR'S FOOTNOTE	STATUS
01	Westminster Arms	9-10 Storey's Gate, Westminster, SW1H, rebuilt 1913	C1	Backdrop pub on Ellie's first walk along Halliwell's last route in Chapter 1; not a Crown node, but the corner from which the geometry of the Cartographer's Arms becomes visible.	Grade II listed, rebuilt 1913; nine-ten Storey's Gate. The division bell wired to Parliament still rings here at vote time.	Real (still exists)
02	The Cartographer's Arms	Invented Great Smith Street pub	C1	Seven-pointed-crown beermat with the legend EAT YOUR OWN in Eddie Halliwell's hand; the sign above the door bears a seven-pointed crown in place of the proper Cartographers' arms; floor angle two degrees off true; postcard to Eleanor Voss propped on the windowsill.	Invented for the novel. No licensed Cartographer's Arms exists on Great Smith Street; the address sits on real Abbey-owned land and is the geometric centre of the seven-pointed crown.	Fictional
03	Holly Bush, Hampstead †	Grade II listed pub at 22 Holly Mount, NW3	C2	Background reference. Voss's notebook lists it as an out-of-set Hampstead anchor -- no code observed; included for completeness of the northern arm of the crown.	Grade II listed pub at 22 Holly Mount; the building dates from the 1790s and became a pub by 1807.	Real (still exists)
04	The Anchor, Bankside	Historic riverside pub, 34 Park Street, SE1, with origins claimed back over 800 years	C4 / C7	Voss's notebook entry 6; flagged because the 1666 Great Fire's south-bank advance halted at this site.	Bankside pub on the site of an inn from which Samuel Pepys reportedly watched the Great Fire on 2 September 1666; the present building largely 18th-century. Still trading.	Real (still exists)
05	The George, Borough †	Galleried 17th-century coaching inn at 75-77 Borough High Street, SE1	C4	Voss's notebook entry 2; flagged because a freeman of the Worshipful Company of Cartographers held the licence 1714-22.	The George Inn is the last surviving galleried coaching inn in London; owned by the National Trust since 1937 and still trading.	Real (still exists)
06	The Lamb & Flag, Covent Garden	Grade II listed Fuller's pub at 33 Rose Street, WC2E	C4	Voss's notebook entry 3; an asymmetric east-wall floor plan is flagged as a possible hidden structural feature.	A 17th-century pub on Rose Street, long nicknamed the Bucket of Blood after the bare-knuckle prizefights held upstairs. Still trading (Fuller's).	Real (still exists)
07	The Mayflower, Rotherhithe †	Riverside pub at 117 Rotherhithe Street, SE16, named for the 1620 sailing of the Pilgrim Fathers	C4 / C7	Voss's notebook entry 5; the bricked-up east-wall door is dated to the 17th century, contradicting the standard reference (Sefton).	Originally The Shippe, c. 1550; renamed in the 1950s after the Mayflower, which sailed for Plymouth from this stretch of the Thames in 1620. Still trading.	Real (still exists)
08	The Old Cock, Holborn	Ye Olde Cock Tavern, 22 Fleet Street, EC4Y (in the Holborn/Temple area)	C4	Voss's notebook entry 1; the 'stone above arch' is flagged as a cartographic checkpoint.	Ye Olde Cock Tavern, 22 Fleet Street -- a 16th-century alehouse, dismantled and rebuilt across the road in 1887 when the Royal Courts of Justice were widened.	Real (still exists)
09	The Spaniards Inn, Hampstead	Historic Hampstead Lane pub, NW3 7JJ, dating from 1585, with adjacent toll house	C4	Voss's notebook entry 4; flagged for its position on a historic toll route into London.	A 1585 inn beside the old Hampstead toll-gate, name still marked by the Toll House opposite. Mentioned by Dickens in Pickwick; Keats wrote nearby. Still trading.	Real (still exists)
10	The Red Lion, Parliament Street	Grade II listed Fuller's pub at 48 Parliament Street, SW1A, with a Westminster division bell	C5	Meeting point chosen by Jonah Hale; he slides Ellie a slip with the address of pub #142 (Captain Kidd) and the single underlined word: Tonight.	A pub has stood on this Whitehall corner since at least 1434; the present 1890 building is Hoare & Co. The drinking place of choice for Treasury and Cabinet Office civil servants.	Real (still exists)
11	Old Wapping Stairs	Wapping Old Stairs is a real flight of stone steps on Wapping High Street, E1W, beside the Town of Ramsgate	C6	The hidden eighth dot, half-erased from the river map. Its cellar contains an allegorical fresco of seven hands, a 19th-century skeleton, and the Wapping Ledger page naming Voss as 'cleared for return'.	Composite. The Wapping Old Stairs are a real Thames river-access point of mediaeval origin, still extant beside the Town of Ramsgate; the public house demolished in 1834 is fictional.	Composite (real-world inspired)
12	Town of Ramsgate, Wapping	Historic riverside pub at 62 Wapping High Street, E1W, claiming origins back to the 1460s	C6	Hale's advertised first rendezvous; later the surveillance point from whose rooftop a Crown sniper covers the Wapping foreshore.	Mediaeval river pub above the Wapping Old Stairs, named for the Ramsgate fishermen who landed their catch here from the 16th century; site of Judge Jeffreys's capture in 1688. Still trading.	Real (still exists)
13	Prospect of Whitby	Historic riverside pub, 57 Wapping Wall, E1W, claiming origins around 1520	C7	Third anchor of the Wapping triangle; its roof is used by a Crown operative as a counter-sniper position covering the Old Wapping Stairs foreshore.	Claims a 1520 foundation, which would make it London's oldest riverside tavern; later associated with Pepys, Turner, and Whistler. Still trading.	Real (still exists)
14	The Captain Kidd, Wapping	Grade II listed Samuel Smith's pub at 108 Wapping High Street, E1W, opened 1990 in a 19th-century coffee warehouse	C7	Apex of the Wapping triangle with the Town of Ramsgate and the Prospect of Whitby; given to Ellie as a decoy meet by Hale, who is in fact at the Old Wapping Stairs.	Riverside pub in a converted 18th-century coffee warehouse, named after the privateer hanged at Execution Dock in 1701. Still trading (Samuel Smith's).	Real (still exists)
15	The Old Bell, Fleet Street	Grade II listed pub at 95 Fleet Street, EC4Y	C9	Working pub above a Wren-era cellar; the cellar wall is pinned with letters from 1666 onwards, one signed 'M.V.' in Voss's hand and dated five weeks before the present.	Built by Christopher Wren c. 1670 as a hostel for the masons rebuilding St Bride's after the Great Fire; the below-stairs vault is genuine Wren-era brick. Still trading.	Real (still exists)
16	Lincoln's Inn	One of the four Inns of Court, WC2A, founded by the 14th century	C18	Not a public house -- the Inn of Court Ellie crosses in Chapter 18 on her way to the British Library reading room. The librarian's two-fingered salute lands here as a private Crown sign.	Included as a Crown-adjacent location at the author's request -- one of the four Inns of Court, founded by the 14th century. The Inn's library holds the only surviving 1684 draft of the Charter referenced in Chapter 30.	Real (still exists)
17	The Constitution (pub off Pratt Street)	Young's pub, 42 St Pancras Way, NW1, opened 1858	C19	Deliberately not a Crown node. Where Inspector Reyes meets Ellie at half past six and confesses his descent from Marcus Reyes, a 1684 signatory who chose to remain outside the order.	Young's pub, 42 St Pancras Way (the book locates it 'off Pratt Street'; the actual address is the adjacent St Pancras Way). Opened 1858; overlooks the Regent's Canal.	Real (still exists)
18	The Lamb, Lamb's Conduit Street	Grade II listed Young's pub at 94 Lamb's Conduit Street, WC1N	C20	Walked past, not entered, in Chapter 20 -- Ellie crosses Bloomsbury at six p.m. under the Audi's slow tail. The Lamb's Victorian snob screens reflect the headlights once.	Grade II listed Young's pub at 94 Lamb's Conduit Street. First recorded 1731; famous for the etched-glass snob screens that were never removed.	Real (still exists)

† Cartographer's adjustments — Holly Bush, Hampstead shifted to Hammersmith (8.3 km); The George, Borough shifted to Battersea (5.5 km); The Mayflower, Rotherhithe shifted to Greenwich (3.9 km). Real addresses listed in the Address column above; the dashed connectors on the map opposite tie each ghost dot to its vertex.

WHY PUBS

A pub is the perfect dead-drop because no one comes to a pub to look for one. Crowds enter and leave on their own clock. Strangers are expected. A photograph taken at the bar reads as a tourist's snapshot. An object left on a ledge is a forgotten umbrella, not evidence.

The architecture helps. London's older houses are layered with marks the public has stopped seeing: mason's signs, brass plaques, dated lintels, tally numerals scratched into rails. To the regulars these are wallpaper. To a code-reader they are a public-facing index that needs no maintenance and answers to no one.

And there is the alibi. A man who meets another man in a pub at half past six on a Tuesday is doing the most ordinary thing in London. He is having a pint. Anything else he is doing — reading a chalked numeral, photographing a step, leaving a folded note inside a matchbook — is screened by the simple fact that pubs exist.
